Price is Wit, Brevity is the Soul of Withence the Soul of Price is BREVITY.

Nothing succests like success.

This truthful old adage becomes more real every day. The story of the month of April closed—one brief month in our new store—What have we done?—Howered our prices—increased our rusiness. A small business cannot create low prices—the bigger the business cannot create low prices—the lower the price.

The sensation line struck deep when we named $20 for a suit to order—not the result of an accident—but of recentains plans, broad, liberal and well ordered. The larger our our-let the better we can do for you and for ourselves. We can buy lower—hence sell lower. It's but natural that we should want your trade. We have added a new cutter and designer to our cutting department force.

some cases beyond it. The brotherhood of wheelmen laughed the railroads to scorn as they sped down the boule-vards on their pneumatic tire machines, dis-tancing the street cars and giving the elevated trains a good race. All sorts of vehicles were pressed into service. From carriages with crests emblazoned on their panels down to the humble but serviceable express wagon, whose owner exacted a round price for the use of a springless vehicle drawn by an antiquated and decrepit horse, everything on wheels was for the fair. Those who failed to secure transportation to their liking-and these were many set off on foot, and the sidewalks were filled ith marchers, sometimes four abreast, all

This fourth division was the Chicago Hussars, headed by Capt. E. L. Brand and Adjt. Thomas S. Quincy. They appeared for the first time in their America sized Russian uniform. There were six score of them mounted on mag nificent black chargers, and every man a giant. It had originally been intended that of Bayard avenue to Palmer avenue, entering the parade should form at the Auditorium and the Midway Plaisance through the western gatepromenade to the cattance gate, it was attended by an almost unbroken diapasm of cheering. As for the reception that was given the duchess, it could not have been heartier had the queen of the White House ridden beside her lord and master. The big bouquet that reposed in her lap when she left the Lexington House was fairly buried under the blossoms that were tossed into the carriage by the Michigan avenue belles, mingled with which were a number of miniature stars and stripes that the duchess is likely to preserve as valued souvenirs.
